-20S, \... and I was losing opportunities in the other games to grind to those Ss. This was also an experience of thinking: what if I could play these games as a non-converted player, while maintaining my position in the higher levels of my current experience? But that was something I could not or would not do. I was good at games that I liked, and some of the things I did to be the best at them went against what I valued in games in general. I liked the feeling of achievement I got from beating a hard game. I liked watching others play my games, even though I had won them myself. I liked seeing a difficult game working, but especially when I didn't know why a game was working. I liked that games were a thing I could play, and I liked the feeling of achievement when I did. I liked to re-play, which can often be found to be what converts love about games. I liked the feeling of building up my own knowledge of the mechanics of games. I have since read a lot of posts by converts who have felt similar things, and I can only remember to be happy for them that they have escaped the trap they felt they were in, and can now enjoy the games they love for themselves. My conversion was a long and slow process. I got my first computer at university, and the only games I played on it were ZZT and Tk. I started to play through the open source programming game that came with the machine, and found this a lot more fun, and more rewarding than Tk. I was playing it at every spare moment, because it was so much fun. I never got better, never beat anything, I just had fun, and I got more and more enthusiastic and more and more obsessed with the game. At a certain point, I decided to move on to a different game, and this one came with a diskette. I downloaded the installer, and just clicked on the game, and went straight to the start screen. I started playing, and I didn't know I was playing it at all. I had no understanding of the concepts I was just playing around with. But I didn't care, I was having fun. I didn't think of conversion. I was converted the next day. I spent my first year of university converting my friends to spacebar's games. At university, I had a disk 82157476af
